But as well as ruling-party propaganda, another tactic has been increasingly apparent: to stop us from talking about it at all. The tools for this are increasingly sophisticated. Take a recent video produced by Chinese state television to mark the 20th anniversary of the 1989 Tiananmen Square protests. The footage shows an empty square – it's only when you click on it that the 50-minute broadcast reveals an eerie song in the background, and an army of reporters in front of a banner: "The people have triumphed!" A new tactic of the Chinese government is to bombard the world with tweets or social media posts about their so-called "internet firewall", which was a temporary and feeble attempt to suppress news coverage of the Hong Kong protests. This tactic is certainly worrying, because it could lead to a general suppression of the voices and messages of activists, protesters, writers and others who have called for more freedom in Hong Kong. But perhaps equally worrying is the fact that this "tweet bubble" has spread so rapidly across the internet, as shown by the chart above. In the absence of an alternative image source, a simple Google search for "Hong Kong protests" generated the same image. But is it censorship? To get a sense of how important information from this event has been censored by the Chinese government, the OECD has collected data on internet censorship around the world, and the amount of censorship was small in China, as measured in the percentage of non-blocked results for a given search. The picture is stark: not only is there little to no internet censorship in Hong Kong, the country's approach to it is quite the opposite. By comparison, the latest global figures for internet censorship as a percentage of results blocked for a given search are: 12% in the US
